The Great Fire

The Great Fire of London began in the early hours of Sunday September 2, 1666, in the shop of King's baker, Thomas Farynor. The blaze spread swiftly after sparks from the shop in Pudding Lane fell on hay in the yard of an inn next door.

Within minutes the flames had reached the warehouse on the banks of the River Thames. Many of these stored highly inflammable goods like oil, coal, wood for building.

By 8 a.m. the fire was halfway across old London Bridge. The Mayor of London arrived on the scene and was asked for permission to pull down buildings in the path of the fire to stop the flames. He hesitated, fearing he would be held responsible for the cost of the rebuilding. By the time the order was finally given to start the demolition, it was too late – the fire was out of control.

The blaze finally burned itself out after five days. By that time much of the city had been destroyed, including more than 13,000 houses and 87 churches. Amazingly, only six people were definitely known to have died in the flames.
